Working together for a safer London

Freelance Translators – translating into and out of English in the following languages

Bengali, Cantonese, Danish, Estonian, Georgian, Gujarati, Korean, Norwegian, Punjabi (India), Punjabi (Pakistan), Slovak, Slovene, Swedish, Tamil and Thai

£ attractive

50,000 people make up the UK's largest police service. They are as different and diverse as the millions of Londoners they serve. But whoever they are, and whatever their role, they all work as one team with the aim of delivering quality policing that builds trust and makes London the world's safest major city.

If you're a professional translator (not interpreter) in any of the above languages, this is a rare chance to get involved in our important work – whether that's by translating documents obtained in the course of an investigation, or requests for assistance from the authorities of other countries. Joining us on a freelance basis, you'll need to be able to accept assignments at short notice, as well as remain calm, impartial and professional in sometimes difficult circumstances.

Fluent in both English and the second language (both oral and written), you'll be a member of either the Institute of Translation and Interpreting or the Chartered Institute of Linguists. We're also looking for a Diploma in Translation (Law), an MA in Translation or a BA with translation components coupled with considerable experience. Knowledge of police and court procedures is essential, as is previous experience in translation, preferably in the field of criminal law.

In return for your skills and ambition, you can expect competitive remuneration and opportunities for training, as well as the chance to get involved in some interesting assignments.

To request an application pack for this exciting opportunity, email Sarah Robson at info@sr-communications.com specifying which language(s) you are applying for or download the application form from www.sr-communication.com.
